- Wildlife, plants and all park buildings, signs, tables and other structures are protected; removal or damage of any kind is prohibited. Hunting, feeding of wildlife and gathering firewood on state park property is prohibited.
- Pets must be on leash and under physical control at all times. This includes trail areas. Pet owners must clean up after pets on all state park lands.
Steptoe Butte State Park Heritage Site is situated on a thimble-shaped, 3,612-foot-tall quartzite butte in southeast Washington. The 150-acre day-use park is known for the stark, dramatic panoramic view it provides of surrounding farmlands, the Blue Mountains and other neighboring ranges and peaks. From the top of the butte, the eye can see 200 miles and into Idaho and Oregon states.

Interpretive signs provide information on the butte and surrounding mountain ranges. A sign interpreting the history of the Cashup Hotel, which once stood on top of the butte, is featured in the park. A National Natural Landmark, the park is popular for impressive views of eastern Washington geography and its rich history.

Park history
Native Americans called the butte “the power mountain.” It was believed that a journey to the butte bestowed a gift of power from the mountain’s guardian spirit. During western settlement, the butte was called “Pyramid Peak.” The butte figured significantly in the last U.S. Army/Indian conflict in eastern Washington as a reconnaissance point. The butte’s present name honors Colonel Edward Steptoe, who led the U.S. Army in that last conflict.

Steptoe Butte once held a hotel and an observation point built by James S. “Cashup” Davis. The Cashup Hotel closed after Davis’ death in 1896 and burned down in 1911. Conservationist, pharmacist, economist and historian, Virgil Talmadge McCroskey (1876-1970), later purchased a large portion of the butte and donated it to the state. A plaque honoring McCroskey remains at Steptoe Butte State Park Heritage Site.
